

Family is Always There - Lowell Amiotte - OSEU #2

Very important, you know, your relationships. I think at times we forget just how family, when you come right down to it, is going to be with you your whole life. You can have friends come and go and they're really good friends for this period and then they get a job and they're gone. And you exchange Christmas cards and it fades. But family is always there. And in the end, that's what you have to really rely on. And I'm getting older, so the older I get. And I got a letter yesterday. I had a friend die in Sioux Falls and now that's gone. That friendship is... gone. So I don't even know her family. They were all up in Saint Paul. So you lose those connections. Whereas right now I can still pick up the phone, call my uncles, my aunts, and as old as I am, I still have an uncle and aunts are living. So or, you know, I'll call and say, say to my cousin, come, let's have coffee and we'll go down and have a donut or something. And but family is very important because that's what you come to in the end is family.
